The Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) yesterday called on President Ma Ying-jeou ([][]]) to grant former president Chen Shui-bian ([][]) medical parole after a magazine reported on the deterioration of Chen's health.

The DPP Central Standing Committee yesterday reached a resolution to demand that Ma grant medical parole for Chen, who is serving an 18-and-a-half-year sentence for corruption, but has been hospitalized for treatment of various complications.

"We urge President Ma to let former president Chen go home for the Lunar New Year holidays. It's best for him to be at home with his family during the New Year holidays," DPP Chairman Su Tseng-chang ($\Bar{\pi} \Bar{\pi} \Bar{\pi}$) told a press conference.

Support for granting medical parole has become stronger after 17 city and county councils passed resolutions in support of the move, Su said.

The Chinese-language Next Magazine yesterday published an article that cited a 28-second video clip recorded during a visit to see Chen at Taipei Veterans General Hospital, where the former president is undergoing treatment. The report said Chen is suffering deteriorating Parkinson's disease.

afternoon that he recorded the video when he visited Chen, but said that he neither distributed the video clip nor posted it on the Internet.

Led by DPP Legislator Mark Chen ([][]]), eight DPP and Taiwan Solidarity Union (TSU) legislators called a joint press conference yesterday afternoon at the legislature in Taipei, urging the Ministry of Justice to reconsider Chen's application for medical parole.

If former Executive Yuan secretary-general Lin Yi-shih ([][]]), who has been bailed after being indicted on corruption charges, has been able to return to his Kaohsiung home for the Lunar New Year, the former president should receive the same treatment, Mark Chen said.

In Kaohsiung, Chen Chih-chung (□□□), the former president's son, said he did not mind Twu recording his father without prior consultation with the family. He said he hoped that medical parole could be granted to his father, who is battling mental illness.
